Control for Clinicians

The Market for Clinical Guidelines

Clinical guidelines are one of the most influential and visible tools that clinicians use in their day-to-day practice. They offer guidance on the diagnosis, treatment, and prevention of disease. They are widely used by clinicians both in hospitals and in primary care offices around the world. However, clinical guidelines have always been considered to be a 'governmentally' sponsored product. Clinicians have viewed them as a powerful regulatory tool that was required to ensure appropriate use of healthcare resources. In fact, in some countries, clinicians are legally obligated to use guidelines. In the United States, for example, the Physician Payment Sunshine Act mandates that physicians must report payments for any form of guideline development. However, clinicians are now beginning to see that clinical guidelines can actually enhance their professional practice and provide them with a competitive advantage in the marketplace. A recent survey of clinicians indicates that their biggest barrier to the use of guidelines in practice is a lack of time and funding. The result is that clinicians have little time to track the latest emerging clinical information. The second biggest barrier is a lack of trust in the quality of the information included in guidelines. A great deal of effort has been spent by medical associations producing guidelines to ensure that they are of the highest quality. However, the lack of trust in the information in guidelines remains a major barrier. The third largest barrier to using guidelines is that clinicians are not convinced that clinicians can make the same decisions that they make. They are concerned that the decisions made by others do not match the evidence in the guidelines. This barrier is compounded by the fact that clinicians have traditionally been taught to not share their personal views in practice. The introduction of a new method of clinical practice guideline production is likely to mitigate these barriers. Instead of simply providing a collection of recommendations in
